Notes for MARY JANE MANDER:

Jane Mander's first ambition was to write fiction, and it is as a novelist that she is best remembered today. Through circumstances, however, journalism was to be her main occupation. In 1881 her father Frank Mander bought a small sawmill and some bush at Awhitu, near the Manukau Harbour, and the family shifted there. Jane's formal schooling began at Wellsford in 1883, but was soon interrupted: it has been estimated that the Manders moved around 30 times as Frank searched for kauri to mill. From 1885 Jane attended Port Albert, Kaiwaka and Onehunga schools. When there were no schools to go to, her mother taught her and encouraged her gift for storytelling.

In 1892 at the age of 15 Jane returned to Port Albert to become a pupil-teacher. For the next seven years she taught at Devonport, Otahuhu and Newton West primary schools. She studied at night for her matriculation and in 1896 passed in eight subjects. At the end of 1899 she resigned from teaching in order to write a novel. By 1902 the family had moved to Whangarei where Frank Mander bought the Northern Advocate newspaper, and until 1906 Jane was its sub-editor and reporter.

As a young woman she longed to escape the 'brain-benumbing, stimulus-stifling, sense-stultifying, soul-searing silence' of provincial New Zealand, which she felt was restricting her intellectual growth. In 1907 and 1910 she visited Sydney and on the second occasion stayed for over a year. From Sydney she wrote for the Maoriland Worker under the pen-name Manda Lloyd (perhaps because her conservative father was now MP for Marsden). While there she also heard about the new School of Journalism at Columbia University, New York, and decided to enrol.

Jane Mander left New Zealand in 1912 and went to England taking with her the manuscript of a novel; it was subsequently turned down by four publishers. In September she arrived in New York to start her university career at Barnard College, Columbia University. She studied English, French, history, science, philosophy, and politics, gaining A's for all subjects. A combination of ill health, lack of money and involvement in writing projects forced her to discontinue full-time study in 1914 and she did not graduate.

Mander had begun writing almost as soon as she arrived in America and had articles published in the New Republic ; she also commenced work on a new novel. After the First World War broke out she put her writing to one side. She was employed in various jobs in support of women's suffrage and the war effort, and then began working for the American Red Cross as a warehouse administrator, a position she held until the end of the war.

In 1918 Jane Mander's most famous novel, The story of a New Zealand river, was accepted by the London publishing house of John Lane, but because of wartime restrictions was not published until 1920. It has since been republished three times, most recently in 1994. Set in a Northland timber-milling settlement, the novel focuses on the differences between two generations of women.

Notes for LOUISA EDWARDS:

John Herbert Hill's wife Louisa was part Maori. She was also known as Te Ruhi. Maori love nicknames & I think her gravestone has only a nickname.

Her father was, I believe, half Maori & half white. He therefore had different names by which he was known in the white, & Maori communities. Eruera is Maori for Edward & I believe a Mr Edwards was probably his father. Eru is a common diminutive & one he used. Googling will turn up some information on him.

I think Louisa's mother was probably full Maori. She also was known by another surname Patuone, a name which carries "mana" or status in her community.

I think that after John Herbert Hill died Louisa adopted a "whangai" son, Fredrick Archie Whangai is an informal adoption common among Maori (actually no formal adoption existed in New Zealand until the 1920's). The child is often a close relative's child
